paramedics are storytellers the profession lends itself to acts of narration with every service call becoming woven into a tale about odds overcome and laced with humorous rhetoric in this thesis i argue that paramedics stories do more than fill the air with conversation to pass the time they serve a distinct purpose within the professional culture allowing for its members to navigate the harshest realities of their work environment by applying an ethnography of communication framework i examine the uses of paramedic narratives while also combating the insider bias of being a paramedic myself in using a combination of participant observation and semi structured interviews i explore the diverse purposes of paramedic narratives which include educating building a sense of belonging validating decisions and compartmentalizing trauma my work as a paramedic left me feeling complete with a sense of mental strength after the completion of yet another shift i left my ambulance station watching it slowly disappear in my rear view mirror while on my way home it was just a matter of time before my inner strengths and confidences would transform back into depression anxieties and suicidal thoughts all which i attempted to comfort with my selection of alcohol my physical injuries accompanied with complex ptsd had me recognize that my days in this field should be counting down but i wasn t sure how or where to begin to depart a career which i had been so passionate about where was i to find the courage to leave before the collection of dark thoughts would find their way back inside my head and potentially ruin my life as i knew and loved a true story of a paramedic within the province of ontario who found it necessary to confront not only his own demons but some of those who were placed in charge of his care while in his struggle with ptsd now updated to include an epilogue on how the author is doing now this reference to medical conditions and treatments updates the scientific information current trends and developments in the field of medicine
